

Tekitouna Gyoza (???????)

NIBBLEDISH CONTRIBUTOR

Ingredients

Ingredient amounts are rough if they exist, and intended only to give you a ballpark idea. You can't go that wrong if you follow your preferences.

Filling:

- 1.5 pounds ground pork
- 1 whole head garlic, diced (I like garlicky gyoza, you may, of course, use less)
- A small or medium knob of ginger, grated
- Cabbage or nappa cabbage, shredded (I use quite a bit, it gives the filling a lighter texture).
- Nira chives (garlic chives), most of a bunch, finely chopped
- ~2/3T Mirin
- ~1 T Soy sauce
- ~1 T Sesame oil
- 1 Egg
- Salt
- Pepper

Gyoza skins (this made about 1.5 packages worth. A good rule of thumb is that 1 pound of meat is about 1 package of gyoza.)

Instructions

I was taught to make these by a friend of mine who learned how to cook Japanese food

---

---

as part of his training to become a kodo drummer in Japan.

Tekitou means makeshift or thrown together. Basically these are gyoza that will turn out well no matter what.

Instructions:

Just mix all the filling ingredients in a large bowl. Most of the work is in the chopping. I like to knead it together with my hands until the texture is smooth.

To form gyoza:

Brush off excess flour from the gyoza skin you're using.

Form a small amount of filling into a ball or (American) football shape in the center of a gyoza skin.

Wet a finger with water and run across half the circumference. Close the gyoza into a half-circle and make 4-5 pleats in the closed wrapper. Put on wax paper and bend so that the bottom looks like a crescent shape.

This is much easier than it sounds.

You can now cook them or freeze for later.

To freeze:

Place gyoza on a wax paper-covered cookie sheet so that they're not touching and freeze. Once frozen, you can put them in ziploc and put into the freezer again for long-term storage. This is so the gyoza don't freeze together.

To cook:

Heat oil in a frying pan. Put gyoza in, making sure to keep the pan moving so they don't stick to the bottom. After they brown, dump in a little bit of water and cover until cooked thoroughly. Serve with a mixture of soy, vinegar, sesame oil and garlic or ginger.